Final exam

—with a prayer from Cymbeline

Under an awning in a parking lot, I proctor an exam in time of Covid. It is a week till Christmas, and the sun beats underneath the tent from its low place above the islands in the gaping sea. Each at a desk, the students bend with masks and pen their thoughts on those who took their lives in Shakespeare's tragedies—how Romeo left not a drop of poison on his lips for Juliet to taste. How Goneril destroyed herself for spite. How Gloucester too tried leaping from the brink, so overcome with sorrow, and Othello with his shame. Even the ocean spread so bright below could be where Roderigo yet might choose, like pigs of old down cliffs of Gadara, to dive and drown himself incontinently. The students finish writing, one by one, and rise in quiet triumph to present their meditations, thanking me in turn. And then they take their unregarded leave. I'm left to pray each one might find their way into the darkness, through the solstice shade. And for myself I add this prayer as well: To your protection I commend me, gods, From fairies and the tempters of the night.
